CORRESPONDENCE.

786 LAFAYETTE AVE.,
—BROOKLYN, N. Y., Nov. 18, 1889.
It has always seemed to me that if preachers and lecturers and writers would have more to say concerning the cultivation and enjoyment of the present hour, there might be less haste and less waste of precious time and more precious health. The housekeeper sweeps and dusts and scrubs to-day that she may be clean to-morrow. To-morrow she bakes and roasts that there may be something good to eat the next day. The next day brings its duties, and instead of getting any comfort from her hard work, she finds herself too exhausted and generally too "blue"—both of which conditions are the direct result of over-work—to enjoy anything. Now, if the average housekeeper is going to wait for her pleasure or her recreation until she gets all her sewing done and all her work "done up," she will never have any in this world, and to tell the truth, I am very doubtful about any in the other. Such habits are hard to break. Three-quarters of the walking hours of the majority of our housekeepers are spent in labor of one kind or another, and if one works only to get through, life resolves itself into a wearing and wretched round of drudgery. If a woman is so situated as to be obliged to make bread and pies for her family, why not accept the position gracefully and teach herself to take some comfort in these processes? To make a toothsome and digestible pie is as much a work of art as to paint a picture. The trouble is not with the pies, nor so much with the disposition of the pie-maker towards the pies. It is with the amount of work which the housekeeper elects to push through. This, in nine cases out of ten, is beyond the strength of the strongest, and in seven cases out of ten, could be lightened, I believe, by the application of a little common sense. For instance, to turn a house upside down every Friday, because Friday is sweeping day, is in many instances the height of folly. A little brushing up, with a careful dusting, will often answer the whole purpose, with a sixteenth part of the work. Just here many weary housekeepers will doubtless exclaim:

"Oh, but I don't feel clean when the regular sweeping is not done." I haven't much patience with these excuses. With such, there is nothing to eat in the house unless there is fresh bread and pies, and jelly cake and fruit cake, and so on ad infinitum and literally ad nauseam. I believe a woman of ordinary capacity can train herself to enjoy doing a respectable amount of work. But no woman can enjoy unintermittent drudgery. The cry goes up from women all over the land that they have no time to read. Well, now, I would make time by sweeping once in two or three weeks, and by cooking the simplest and consequently the best things for my family, and I would save money enough to buy magazines galore, and strength enough to read them with pleasure and profit. It is an outrage for an intelligent woman to have nothing to read.

Who will say that humanity is not "evolution" when Mary Anderson makes bread, and the "divine and incomparable Patti" conceals broths and delicacies for the sick, and the daughters of the Russian aristocracy learn to use the Remington typewriter?

A correspondent of a San Francisco paper writes that—"Mental growth is nowhere so perceptible as among the women of Russia. Many of them are not only artistic in their tastes, good musicians and good artists, but they are fast learning to be useful. They sew and embroider, and do a few of the girls of the court design and really make their own dresses. There is a cooking craze in Russia, and a photographic and typewriting craze."

I am informed that a vast number of Remington typewriters find their way to Russia, and I prove an inspiration and solace to the "highly born," and a means of support to the intelligent among the working classes.

"Constant Reader" shows by the very first line of her communication that while she may be "constant," she is certainly not correct. "I am very sorry to hear you inveigh so strongly against remedial agents, especially quinine," she writes; "quinine will break up a cold more speedily than anything else, beside being the best tonic I know of." Now, as I never have said one word against quinine, properly administered this accusation is aggravating, to say the least. Quinine will break up a cold if administered at an early stage, but it should always be taken in capsules. The new preparation, called the "Soft Soluble Capsules of Quinine Sulphate," are the best of anything I have ever tried, because as soon as they strike the stomach they are instantly dissolved, and so do their work at once and without waste. This is not the case with the ordinary pill.

To my friends who have asked about cures for deafness, and the merits of the different mechanical inventions now before the public, I am sorry to say that I have not yet found anything to fill the bill. The very old fashioned and most hideous "tin horn" instrument may have been improved upon, but I have yet to see the machine that can do it. I do not know that any of these ancient horns are now manufactured. A popular ear specialist told me the other day that many cases of deafness are produced by the habit of picking the ear with a pin, and the different quack remedies for removing the hardened wax. The ear is as delicate in its mechanism as the eye, and should not be ignorantly treated.

The little dressy "house jacket," about which so many questions have been asked can be made of cloth or velvet, in black, blue, copper, brown, dahlia, or mahogany. Some of them have bodices, and are exceedingly stylish and becoming. As they can be worn with any kind of a skirt, they are economical as well as pretty and convenient.

Cord passementerie is more fashionable than bead just now. It has the advantage of newness, and the double advantage of being lighter in weight. Some of these passementeries in Gothic points and arabesques are beautiful, and make exquisite trimmings for wraps of every description. Remember in buying trimmings that weight means drag and weakness, if not positive disease, and lightness means comfort and health.

THEIR END RECORDED.

Last Days of Some Noted Leaders of the Revolution.

CLOSE OF THE BLOODY YEAR 1794.

Reaction from the Terror—Suicide of the

Devoted Friend of Robespierre—Description of the Death of St. Just and Cothotin.

Justice to Fouquier-Tinville

By JUNIUS HENRI BROWNE.

[Copyright, 1889, by American Press Association.]

XL

Although the Reign of Terror terminated, as we have seen, with the decapitation of Robespierre, the incarnation of its cruellest spirit, the Revolution continued nearly fifteen months longer, still bloody but vastly assuaged. Very few, if any, dreamed that the downfall of the dictator would produce so desirable, so blessed a change in the Republic. But he seems to have been the one man, despite denials of his inherent cruelty, who was devoted to humanity, who, through uncalculated circumstance or uncontrollable confederates, led to satisfy the starving guillotine. Twenty or more of these suffered with him, among them Mayor Fleuriot, Augustin Robespierre, younger brother of the terrorist, Harriet Simon, St. Just, Cothotin. Those names seem to have been strongly attached to him, notwithstanding that he is reported to have been without friends.

FAMOUS REVOLUTIONISTS.

A more devoted friend than Louis (Philippe) Francois could not be. He had indissolubly attached himself to the fortunes of Robespierre, in whom his faith was unswerving. He was a man of pure and fine talents, who was absorbed in work, in carrying out the ideas of his chief. This, in truth, was his whole ambition. Not being conspicuous in the revolutionary proceedings, he might easily have escaped the ruin of July. But when Robespierre was arrested he demanded to share his fate. Consigned to the prison of La Force, he was rescued by Harriet, commanding the troops of the Commune, and taken to the Hotel de Ville. When the soldiers of the convention besieged the building and were on the eve of capturing it, Louis, seeing the inevitable result, shot himself dead; luckier than the dictator, whose bullet had only fractured his jaw.

Harriet and young Robespierre tried to commit suicide by hurling themselves out of the window. The stone flagging would not do the work, and they were severely injured; nevertheless, they were dragged to the guillotine. Shuddering at the sight, hurrying to the aid of the bleeding victims, Louis, who had been so devoted to his chief, was now a victim himself. He was shot dead, and his body was thrown into the guillotine.

LEBON. St. Just on that occasion, brought some one to kill him; Cothotin tried to shoot him, but to no purpose. The fellow traitors must have been evil. Le Bon, who had been so devoted to his chief, was now a victim himself. He was shot dead, and his body was thrown into the guillotine.

St. Just was one of the youngest of the revolutionists, only twenty-two at the close of the most remarkable. A fanatic for freedom, cruelly conscientious and conscientiously cruel, the uprising of the Parisians fired his heart, and filled him with ecstatic visions of liberty. A devoted and intense admirer of the early Greek republics, he was in the province of Nivernais, he rose to the rank of general, and was elected lieutenant colonel of the National Guard and sent to Paris, the year following the outbreak, to take part in the fête of the Federation. He was a man of great energy, and was elected to the Convention by the Convention by the vote of the Convention. He was a man of great energy, and was elected to the Convention by the Convention by the vote of the Convention.

Le Bon, a native of Arras, was originally a priest and professor of rhetoric at Beaune. A democrat by conviction, he welcomed the Revolution, and he was one of the first of his order to marry. This act was regarded as a proof of patriotism, and of attachment to the principles of the Revolution. He was elected to the legislative assembly, and was a member of the committee of public safety, and was sent on various important missions into various districts and towns invaded by foreign forces. He was a man of great energy, and was elected to the Convention by the Convention by the vote of the Convention.

His memory has been bitterly attacked, and he is now regarded as a man of great energy, and was elected to the Convention by the Convention by the vote of the Convention. He was a man of great energy, and was elected to the Convention by the Convention by the vote of the Convention.
